

The thesis aims to present and eventually apply the theory of second order election by analysing the 2009 European parliament election. There are five case studies included that intend to unveil whether the established theoretical premises are still valid or not. The thesis attempts to answer the question whether the tangible discrepancies among old and new members states still remain in place or wheter this divergence is being mitigated.